CHICK-FIL-A BELIEVES THAT SUNDAY SHOULD BE A DAY OF REST

More than 40 years ago, Truett Cathy, a devout Christian, established Chick-fil-A as a company based on strong moral values. Today, those values are still evident in the policies of the company.

Chick-fil-A firmly holds to its tradition of ceasing business on Sundays, a tradition that Cathy started more than four decades ago. Cathy believes that Sundays should be devoted to God and, still, to this day, stands behind this policy.

According to the corporate purpose, Chick-fil-A is a company that strives "to glorify God by being a faithful steward of all that is entrusted to us and to have a positive influence on all who come in contact with Chick-fil-A." Chick-fil-A reflects this corporate purpose in everyday business.

By closing on Sundays, Chick-fil-A provides its employees with a day devoted to worship and family, both of which are highly important to Cathy. Chick-fil-A is also able to employ valuable individuals, interested in working for a Christian-based company.

While Chick-fil-A strives to be America's best chain restaurant, the company believes that closing on Sunday is the key to success. To Cathy, the faith and values of the company are more important than profits.

Some things will never change at Chick-fil-A. Chick-fil-A pledges to always remain a company of morals and make decisions that benefit the well-being of all employees as well as the surrounding community.
